Police: London knife attack not terrorism

By Jill Lawless and Danica Kirka
The Associated Press

LONDON — A Somali-Norwegian teenager went on a knife rampage through London's Russell Square, a hub for students and tourists, fatally stabbing an American woman and wounding five other people.

Police said Thursday that it wasn't terrorism — but in a city on edge after a summer of attacks elsewhere in Europe, both authorities and London residents initially responded as if it were. Police flooded the streets with extra officers and mobilized counterterrorism detectives before saying the shocking burst of violence appeared to have been "triggered by mental-health issues."

Police officers used a stun gun to subdue the 19-year-old suspect at the scene of the stabbings late Wednesday, among busy streets lined with hotels close to the British Museum.

"Terror in London" ran the headline in the Mail

Floral tributes rest against railings Thursday Aug. 4, 2016, near the scene of a fatal stabbing on Wednesday night in Russell Square, London. London police say they have found no signs of radicalization in a knife attack which killed an American woman and injured five other people in London's Russell Square.

Online, one of several media outlets to speculate that the attack was an act of terrorism. Police initially said terrorism was "one line of inquiry being explored."

But hours later Metropolitan Police Assistant Commissioner Mark Rowley said "we have found no evidence of radicalization or anything that would suggest the man in our custody was in any way motivated by terrorism."

He said detectives from the force's murder and terrorism squads had interviewed the suspect, his family and witnesses and searched properties.

"We believe this was a spontaneous attack and the victims were selected at random," Rowley said.

London Mayor Sadiq Khan said "there is no evidence at all that this man was motivated by Daesh" — another name for the Islamic State group — or similar organizations.

Rowley said the suspect, whose name hasn't been released, is a Norwegian of Somali ancestry — though police don't consider that "relevant to the motivation for his actions." Norway's National Criminal Investigation Service said he had left the Scandinavian country in 2002, when he was a small child.

The name of the dead woman, thought to be in her 60s, hasn't been released. U.S. Ambassador Matthew Barzun confirmed she was American, tweeting: "Heart-breaking news that a U.S. citizen was killed in #Russell-Square attack. My prayers are with all the victims and their loved ones."

Two Australians, an Israeli, an American and a British citizen were wounded, none with life-threatening injuries.

Police said a British man with a stab wound to his stomach remains hospitalized. The four others were treated and released Thursday.

While knife crime is a regular occurrence in London — there have been two other blade killings this week — the scale and randomness of the rampage rattled nerves. It came just days after authorities warned the British public to be vigilant in light of attacks inspired by the Islamic State group elsewhere in Europe.

Student Megan Sharrock, 18, looked out her window and saw someone lying on the sidewalk under a blanket.

"There was like two rivers of blood running away from the person so we thought, yeah, someone has been killed," she said.

"It's really shocking. (a) scary world we live in to think that could happen," she said. "That could happen to anyone, just walking down the street."

Investigators of Ohio family attack suspect multiple killers

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
PIKETON — Investigators are operating under the theory that there were multiple attackers in the slayings of eight people from one Ohio family, authorities confirmed Thursday after months of not finding a possibility.

Local and state investigators have released few details about the April shootings near Piketon, saying they don't want to jeopardize chances of catching and convicting whoever's responsible.

Offering just the slightest bit more detail Thursday, a spokesman for Ohio's Attorney General Mike DeWine confirmed to The Associated Press that investigators are working with the theory that it wasn't a single attacker.

Pike County Sheriff Charles Reader also referenced the suspicion of multiple "killers" Thursday while testifying in a court hearing related to custody of two of the three young children who weren't harmed in the attack.

The Columbus Dispatch reported. Speaking in support of closing those proceedings to the public, Reader said he believes the children are still in danger and worries that making information about them public would amplify that.

Seven adults and a teenage boy from the Rhoden family were found dead at four homes on April 22. A coroner determined all but one of the victims had been shot repeatedly, and some had bruising.

DeWine has said the top priority case might be the biggest in the Ohio Bureau of Criminal Investigation's history in terms of manpower and resources.

A $10,000 reward is being offered for information leading to an arrest and conviction.

The victims were 40-year-old Christopher Rhoden Sr.; his ex-wife, 37-year-old Dana Rhoden; their three children, 20-year-old Clarence "Frankie" Rhoden, 16-year-old Christopher Rhoden Jr.

and 19-year-old Hanna Rhoden; Frankie Rhoden's

fiancee, 20-year-old Hannah Gilley; Christopher Rhoden

Sr.'s brother, 44-year-old Kenneth Rhoden; and a cousin, 38-year-old Gary Rhoden.
