Politics / Great Britain

Scots urged to stick with U.K.

By Griff Witte
THE WASHINGTON POST

LONDON — British Prime Minister David Cameron waded forcefully into the debate over Scottish independence yesterday, making a fervent call to keep the United Kingdom together just seven months before Scots vote on whether to break up the 3-century-old union.

On political, economic and military grounds, Cameron argued, Scotland is better off as a part of Great Britain. But Cameron also made an unusually emotional appeal, invoking Scotch whisky and the British Olympic team as examples of successful collaborations that would be diminished by a split.

"This is our home — and I could not bear to see that home torn apart," he said. "I love this country. I love the United Kingdom and all it stands for. And I will fight with all I have to keep us together."

Polls suggest that most

Scots agree that they should stick with their southern neighbors, and that Scotland will opt to remain a part of Great Britain in the Sept. 18 vote.

Cameron and his Conservative Party are not popular in Scotland, which tilts left politically. He badly needs to keep the United Kingdom from coming unglued, but he also risks alienating Scots if he becomes the face of the campaign against independence. His intervention could be seen as just the sort of English arrogance that the Scots are seeking to escape.

Cameron has insisted that the choice is one the Scots must make themselves, and that they should be the primary players in any debate.

He acknowledged yesterday, "Some people have even advised me to stay out of this issue — and not to get too sentimental about the U.K."

But, he said, "I care far too much to stay out of it. This is personal."

American moved to N. Korea labor camp

WASHINGTON — A U.S. missionary being held in North Korea was moved from a hospital back to a labor camp last month on the same day he publicly appealed for Washington to help get him home, a State Department official said yesterday.

Kenneth Bae, 45, has been held for more than a year in North Korea since being sentenced to 15 years of hard labor for trying to overthrow the state. From last summer until January, he had been kept at Friendship Hospital in Pyongyang, his family said.

"On Jan. 20 he was moved back to a labor camp, according to a Swedish Embassy representative who met with him," a State Department official said.

Bae, a Korean American, last appeared in public at the hospital on Jan. 20 when he was paraded in front of a group of foreign and local reporters and asked Washington to help him get home.

Bae's 23-year-old son, Jonathan, said his father suffers from health problems, including diabetes.

The United States has offered to send its human-rights envoy for North Korea to secure Bae's release, but North Korea has rejected this.
